and an Irish whistle in his pockets—tokens of their adventurous spirit.

As they journey uphill through mud and puddles, they meet an old man who points them in the direction of the Big House, but their path isn't easy. They are splashed by a passing wagon and get even muddier, making them laugh at the ridiculousness of their situation. Jack reflects on previous adventures they've had, specifically mentioning a famous encounter with Louis Armstrong, and wonders if they can find a way to connect with the inhabitants of this new world. When they finally reach the imposing Big House, their excitement is palpable. However, their first attempt to enter is met with a cold reception from a pale teenage girl who quickly slams the door on them. Annie's quick thinking leads her to lie about being sent by the butler, a clever move to gain entry.

After trudging through the mud to the back, they meet Molly, a kind but skeptical young girl, who allows them to enter the kitchen. Here, the atmosphere shifts—there's a warm, inviting smell of cooking, and they're introduced to a grumpy old butler, Mr. O'Leary, who expects a different kind of help. He and the cook humorously list tasks Jack and Annie can't fulfill, like sweeping chimneys or catching rats, which leaves them feeling rather useless.
